Goods and Services:

As part of an economics unit, the next two worksheets can be used in many different ways to introduce, reinforce, or evaluate the concepts of goods and services.

1. Before passing either skill sheet out to the students, the teacher could use the contents to provide whole class practice.

Sample whole-group question: "Which of these provides a service: cook, computer, or lumber?"

2. The skill sheets could be displayed on a white board using a document camera. Students could take turns filling in answers.

3. The teacher could out the first skill sheet, and complete it with the class working as a whole group. Students would independently complete the second skill sheet in class or for homework.

4. Another alternative would be to pass out the first skill sheet for students to work on in pairs, with or without pencils. Students could then return to their seats to independently complete the second skill sheet in class or for homework.

5. If these basic concepts have already been taught, the first skill sheet could be used to review, and the second skill sheet could be used to evaluate the students' understanding. The teacher should encourage students to read the directions carefully for sections C and D. These sections require only one answer per row.

Successful completion of this skill sheet indicates student mastery of these concepts.
